The Michael Anastassiades White Porcelain D2 is a wall light with an emphasis on materiality and simplicity of form. It is distinguished by refined proportions and sophisticated, invisible fixture details that reintroduce porcelain within a contemporary context and distances it from the utilitarian language with which it is often associated. Referring to the Bauhaus porcelain lights used in the 1930s, this simplified version is slip-casted to provide a tough, resistant finish. Due to the manufacturing process, each piece is inherently unique.
